Learning communities, cities and regions have been an important topic over the past decade. They have come to represent an important approach to describing how places respond to emerging challenges, bringing key organisations and people together to learn how to invent new responses to these challenges.

This presentation will draw on the PASCAL International Exchange (PIE) project, which has brought together perspectives from 15 'learning cities' in different parts of the world, and set the project against various debates about how the practical development of learning cities might develop over the next few years.
